This House Believes that phones should be banned in schools

Overall general question: Do phones infringe on the purpose of a school?

Government - for the status quo

- Framing
    - This is the world we live in; students are not distracted,
- Avoid distraction
    - Students are more focused on school work, which
    - Distract people in lessons and limit the attention that they pay to the teacher which can affect the students grades
    - Bad for the student's
- Phones being allowed could encourage breaches of privacy like recording without consent
    - it can enable bullying, particularly cyberbullying
        - Cyberbullying is hard to track and notice as it is online
        - Why is cyberbullying bad?
- Allows students to have face-to-face interaction
    - As they are not spending time on their phone
    - Gain human connection
        - One of the key skills of human
    - Allows you to build life long friendships
        - School is one of the only places to

Opposition - against status quo

- Framing
    - We live in a world with students who are hard to contact; who are forced to lie to teachers

Points:

- Phone as tool for revision
    - Hard for students to revise on the stop
- Outright ban likely to be ineffective
- if a child is in an emergency situation, they would be unable to contact parents or guardians when in need of support
    - Family is biggest support network
        - Many students prefer to go to family members for support as they are more comfortable with them, and trust them more
    - Many schools are likely unable to provide individual support

Rebuttal

- Cyberbullying
    - Does not happen only in schools
    - So effects still exist